

Once a gene has been located and transcribed into mRNA it must first be edited before it can be translated into a protein. This editing process is called splicing. It involves removing non-coding regions, called introns, leaving only the protein coding exons. In the cell, the introns are removed by special enzymes, which recognize specific sequences. These enzymes cut and re-join the coding regions for translation into protein.