

When the nucleic acid is relieved of the constraint of being sort of lock step with another strand in a double helix, it is free to take on all kinds of shapes. Because it can interact with other parts of itself, so the structures that RNA can achieve have a wonderful variety, more on the order of what a polypeptide or protein can achieve and this is what allows RNA to be a biocatalyst rather than just an informational molecule.